Of these children 2,470 were crippled. It is estimated "that slightly over 50 per cent of the crippled children needing special educational services are being provided for to some extent".

"The fact that most of the special classes organized are in the larger cities or centers of population, where the organization of a program is easier, also indicates the necessity of working out a plan whereby rural and sparsely settled areas may provide for their children in need. The Illinois law suggests a partial help in providing for transportation and tuition payments to enable pupils from one district to attend special classes in another district."
